East German Security Measures Against the Refugees

Since the East German refugee flow to West Berlin began to mount sharply in early July, the Ulbricht regime has relied for the most part on an intensification of normal police controls and a strong propaganda campaign to stem the flow. The intensification, however, has been sporadic. On 3 and 4 August the police were rigorously screening passengers on the elevated trains going into West Berlin, but US Military Liaison Mission officers stationed at Potsdam, who made a survey along the zonal border outside West Berlin on 6 August, reported that vehicular and pedestrian traffic was crossing normally. Security checks within East Germany affecting travel to Berlin have been intensified but again apparently without consistency. Interference with traffic crossing the city sector border has been minimal.

The regime has refrained, probably on Moscow's orders, from putting into effect such special internal security measures as requiring special passes for East Germans to visit Berlin or restricting travel to a stated local area. Refugees have frequently reported that such measures are being contemplated.

East German leaders are faced with the dilemma that actions necessary to halt the refugee flow would in all likelihood cause a sharp and dangerous rise in popular discontent. The East German populace already is publicly criticizing the bloc's policies toward West Berlin and openly expressing its discontent with internal conditions in East Germany.

The regime is, however, openly attempting to coerce the 54,000 "border crossers" working in West Berlin to take positions in East Berlin or East Germany, by means of economic sanctions, arrests, and various other pressures. On 4 August, East Berlin officials reactivated a long-dormant decree of 14 July 1953 in an effort to force all "border crossers" to register with authorities and to pay their rent and utility bills in West marks at the legal rate of one West mark to one East mark. The regime is concentrating on the 13,500 border crossers who live in East Germany, rather than on the larger number who live in East Berlin.

Internal Situation in Mali

The ruling party of Mali, the Union Soudanaise, has a Communist-type structure with a politburo and party cells throughout the country. A number of Mali's leaders are sympathetic to Marxism as a result of contacts formed during their studies at French universities and their trade union activities. Communist influence has been increasing at a progressively more rapid pace since Mali proclaimed its independence in September 1960.

Within the politburo the division between the left wing and the moderates is deepening. The principal adherents of the left wing are Madeira Keita (minister of interior), Ousmane Ba (civil service, labor, and social welfare), Henri Corenthin (transport and communications), Seydou Kouyate (planning and rural economy), and Mamadou Aw (public works). They favor stricter party control in the country and even closer Malian association with the Sino-Soviet bloc on the pattern of Guinea. The moderates in the government, who are not well trained, do not form a unified group.

Modibo Keita, who is premier as well as President, has been considered relatively moderate. However, he now is emphasizing his socialist goals and apparently associating himself with the more radical wing of the party. He appears, for example, determined to prevent the development of an influential merchant class.

The French ambassador reports that there is considerable internal unrest; the salaries of civil servants are in arrears, farmer discontent is growing, and merchants are unhappy over the loss of business to state enterprises.
popular demonstrations against the government are being planned for early September. The French ambassador reported in July, however, that the opposition was unorganized and at that time constituted no threat to the regime.
Although Mali is associated with the neutralist bloc of Ghana and Guinea and has entered into increasingly close relations with the blocparticularly in civil aviation mattersBamako has retained considerably more ties with Paris than has Guinea. Mali 7 is still in the French franc zone, will receive some $12,000,000 in French economic subsidies this year, and is considering cultural and technical cooperation agreements with France. However, Mali has left the French Community and requested the evacuation of all French military forces. France has been complying with this latter request and, as of 2 August, retained forces only at Bamako.	25X^
